JW Player.The present invention relates to a primer composition which is suitable for forming a vapor deposition film on a substrate of glass, ceramic, metal or plastic, or which coats such a vapor deposition film, and to a photoelectronic device having such a film. Carbon has been widely used for photoelectronic devices such as solar cells, and other devices which convert light energy into electrical energy. At present, silicon is often used for such devices. However, the use of silicon is disadvantageous in that silicon is relatively expensive, and that the manufacturing process is complicated and the manufacturing cost is high. The use of organic materials to produce solar cells, organic photoelectric transistors, organic light emitting diodes, and organic electroluminescent devices has been considered in view of the capability of organic compounds to exhibit various desired functions such as high chemical stability, low toxicity, ease of manufacturing, and low production costs. In the case of organic photoelectronic devices, an organic photoelectric device is formed by injecting positive and negative electrodes with holes or electrons from a conductive oxide layer of a conductive oxide and an organic semiconductor layer. The organic semiconductor layer has various functions such as a charge carrier transporting function
